Albany may cut pension benefits

By STEPHEN BUEL

ALBANY — The City Council is considering reducing the benefits which are paid out by the city's pension fund, and has asked City Attorney Robert Zweben to report on the legality of such a move.

Acting on a suggestion from Mayor Ruth Ganong and council member Edward McManus, the council requested information comparing the pension fund's benefits with those of other nearby cities.

Council members said at Monday night's meeting that they were just investigating one option for dealing with the projected budget deficts of fiscal year 1982-83. But most of them seemed to want to find alternatives to the pension tax and cutbacks which have been recommended by Administrative Officer William Haden.

Council member McManus said he was not happy with a choice of options which only included a property tax increase or bankruptcy for the pension fund. Haden has said the fund probably will break even next

Will RUSD cut school day?

District needs $5.4 million

By DON McCORMACK

Confronted with a deficit of $5.4 million, administrators of the Richmond Unified School District are proposing shortening the teaching day in many elementary classes and cutting a period from the junior high and high schools.

Superintendent Richard Lovette, at the June 2 meeting of the school board, also suggested eliminating the elementary music program, and funding for 15 gardeners, four vice principals and nine counseling aides and squeezing $172,000 out of the already severely reduced athletic budget.

Lovette called the budget "a sad day in the life of Richmond schools" and said California education is "going down the tubes."

In addition, Lovette also advised the board to drop opportunity classes, which one administrator described as the "the last chance to some kids before they were thrown out."

Also on the chopping block are the instructional material center and $411,000 in busing. The board is scheduled to adopt the budget by September.

Dire predictions, as Lovette allowed, are frequently heard at school budget hearings but this year's warnings are being given unusual credence.

Spending per student has failed to match inflation rates since 1973 when restrictions on raising taxes were placed on school districts, school officials say.

Passed in 1978, Proposition 13 accelerated this trend and shifted educational funding from local property taxes to state taxes, dispensed from Sacramento. At that time, the state had a surplus of $5 billion, which was used to cushion the effects on schools and local governments. One study disclosed that because of the cuts California slipped to 47th among states in educational funding, based on taxes per person.

Now the surplus is gone and, partially because of tax revenues lost in the recession, the state faces a deficit next year, according to state Sen. Dan Boatwright's office, of about $4 billion. Many people are pressing the legislature to raise taxes but this being an election year political observers say a tax increase is highly unlikely.

"Our only hope is that the Legislature will raise taxes," Lovette said.

Gloria Morrison of Kensington implored the board to try a local tax election. In a recent meeting, however, the board tossed cold water on the idea, which would need the approval of two-thirds of the voters.

Previously estimated at $4.4 million, the anticipated deficit swelled with the addition of $386,000 in funding for handicapped studentsand year if no additional revenue is raised, and soon after will sink into debt, and by 1990, bankruptcy.

McManus said he heard citizens complain during the recent elections that the city's pension benefits are far too generous. The pension fund includes "some rather ludicrous things," he said, such as pension payments based on uniform allowances, vacation and incentive pay.

Council member William Johns cautioned that any attempted reduction in the pension fund should be looked at in the light of adjustments to the salaries of the city's employees, to which pension benefits are tied.

McManus suggested that those benefits might be modified in line with what other cities pay, if Albany's pension should be found to be more generous than those of other cities.

Council member Anne Rotramel seemed confident that the city could get pensioners to renegotiate their benefits packages, but said the council should first get a legal opinion from the city attorney.

Modifications of the pension's benefits, if ruled legal, would require ammendment of the City Charter. City Attorney Robert Zweben said he will present the council with a report on the city's exact legal obligations to the fund. He said he is not sure whether the city has an obligation to pay into the fund beyond the 9 percent obligation which is spelled put in the charter.

The council delayed acting on McManus and Ganong's suggestion to form a blue-ribbon committee to study the pension fund, at least until the council receives the information it requested of the city attorney and administrative officer.

A reduction in pension benefits was not one of the suggestions Haden made for dealing with the city's projected 1982-83 deficit. Haden has said he prefers a property tax to raise money for the fund.

"When you're faced with an overall deficit of half a million dollars, I think your first priority is to make up that deficit," Haden said. "The longer you take to solve this problem, the bigger it gets."

He said the proposed property tax would be less expensive than Measure A, the failed property tax measure on last April's ballot. He said a house assessed at $60,000 would pay $57.60 a year in taxes; a $70,000 house, $67.20; an $80,000 house, $76; and at $100,000, $96 a year.

Even with a pension tax, Haden said he thinks the city will have to lay off from four to six of its employees. If the council chose not to raise money through a property tax, he said the number of employees who would have to go would be far greater.

Haden was clearly unhappy with the prospect of any layoffs, but said they seem inescapable. He urged the council to decide quickly what course it will take, so the city's layoff process begin as soon as possible.

The council allocated all $133,000 of its federal revenue sharing money for fiscal 1982-83 to the city's general fund, instead of the pension fund. The council also scheduled a July 6 hearing to get the public's opinion of diverting all $184,000 from last year's revenue sharing grant away from the pension fund to the general fund.

These two votes leave little doubt that the council will be facing a year-end deficit of $338,000 in the pension fund.

It is likely that the pension fund will be the receptacle of the city's deficit. Because of a recent state Supreme Court ruling, it is the only fund for which the council can raise a property tax without going before voters.

Haden said the city could legally raise $306,000 for the pension fund, the amount of projected expenditures in fiscal year 1982/83. Even after a property tax increase of $306,000, Haden projects a deficit of $182,719 for the end of fiscal 1982-83.

He predicts that deficit will translate into the reduction of at least four full-time staff jobs, including the position of assistant fire chief and three other positions which are undisclosed.

And the city's economic picture could be far worse than imagined if the state legislature votes through its so-called "negative bail-out," which in reality is a reduction of its subsidies to cities throughout the state. Loss of that revenue would cost the city about $150,000.

"Negative bailout is kind of an interesting term," said council member Anne Rotramel. She said it sounded more like "swamping the boat."

The council passed a resolution objecting to that proposal, which it plans to send to local representatives in the state senate and assembly.

The administrative officer also suggested that the council increase the admission tax at Golden Gate Fields from $.45 to $.55 as a potential source of $90,000 in revenue. Such an increase would require a two-thirds vote of approval by the public.

$500,000 to pay for increases in medical coverage.

Programs for handicapped students, generally known as special education, are a sore point with local school districts because many of them are ordered by the state but without state funding. This forces school districts to bite into regular programs for money.

Lovette said he would meet with local unions in the hope of revising medical plans to cut costs.

Cutting a period from the junior high and high schools would save $1.6 million, a staff report said. Carving 40 minutes instructional time out of the fourth, fifth and sixth grades would yield $949,000.

The elementary music program would lose about 11 teachers, the opportunity classes six. Gardeners would be reduced to eight to handle 49 elementary schools and 13 secondary schools plus other buildings. The staff also recommended cutting $200,000 from instructional supplies.

Neighborhood crime fighters

citizens can do to help the police do their job.

The police should leave when finished so the residents can have an open discussion of what the neighborhood can do. Ask for volunteers to help prevent crime and divide the tasks among the volunteers.

Tasks include: get a list of all major crimes in the target during the past month so patterns can be identified and guarded against, assign a person to be the contact between the police and the neighborhood, assign a neighborhood business contact person, make a simple map of the area so the target is well defined, and contact a business or nearby hall for a meeting place. Everyone should exchange phone numbers and addresses and then decide when and where the next organizational meeting will be held.

At the second meeting, plan the general neighborhood meeting and start up to spread the word personally about the meeting. Decide what kind of plan would work for the neighborhood — such as whistles, hourly patrols, neighborhood watch or a phone tree — and gather information to implement the program.

At the big neighborhood meeting, have a police officer repeat the crime prevention presentation for the residents and convince the neighbors of the need for such a program.

Out of this meeting, get block captains. Captains will distribute crime alert flyers for their block, hold an annual crime prevention meeting on the block, organize and distribute a map of the block, with a description, phone number and address of each house and act as a contact when the police want to inform the block of a particular problem in their area.

The more neighbors involved, the less work each volunteer will have to do, and the more effective the program will be.

The saga of a driver who plugs in her car at night

By TERRY TOCZYNSKI

LBANY — Emily Fine filled out the entry blank, dropped it the box and walked off.

Two months later, when she got a phone call from a Jersey company telling her she had won an electric Fine couldn't remember ever having entered a con-

"I had forgotten all about it," she said with a laugh. Then it all came back to her.

Fine, who had been appointed by Gov. Jerry Brown non-votingparticipant in the White House Confer- on Aging last November, had decided to take a break the interminable committee meetings to tour the area, where anxious salespeople bubbled about their

"They had everything there for the aged and the de-," Fine said. But what caught her eye was a comical blue vehicle that looked like the unplanned offspring Volkswagen Rabbit and a golf cart.

She lingered a few moments at the display stand, the toy-like orphan with a mixture of puzzlement terest. That was her undoing. For it was then that sually filled out the form that was the future adop- paper, and would turn over responsibility for the tte-ready "tomorrow's car" to Fine.

There were three long months to fill between the se phone call and the arrival of Fine's new charge. , on Sunday, April 18, the delivery was made.

Like most new parents, Fine had no idea of the myriad complications the little one would bring into her life. It had been many years since her two grown sons had left the hearth.

Now, the proud but dubious owner of the comuta-car, Fine said she hopes the auto is finally running well enough that she can drive it around town on errands and give an unsolicited publicity boost to a resurgent alternative to the gasoline-powered car.

But the road to smooth performance has been bumpy.

So although Fine believes in the electric car concept, her conversion has not been so complete that she's willing to let go of her 1965 Volkswagen hatchback.

"I'm not going to part with it until I find this car satisfactory," she said, nodding her head in the direction of the garage where the little blue machine was waiting.

Fine, who holds a master's degree in economics from Smith College, said she figures she made a major economic blunder by never buying a house, and she's not now going to rashly dump her one sound investment.

Fine is a life-long feminist, a member of the Gray Panthers, a former reporter, and one of the early active proponents of the reporters' union, the Newspaper Guild.

She is the widow of Nathan Fine, a foremost authority on the American labor movement who died in Albany three years ago.

Fine has two sons, both attorneys who work in San Francisco and live in Berkeley, and five granddaughters.

Formerly Emily Brown of Lynn, Maine, Fine's American roots date back to the 17th century. One of her predecessors fought in the War of Independence, and that veteran was given the 60 acres of land in Maine which the Brown family still owns.

After waiting months for Commuter Vehicles, Inc. to deliver the celebrated comuta-car, Fine then was confronted with a series of obstacles that almost had her convinced she would never get her car going.

As soon as Fine had paid for the registration on the new car and ordered it a special license plate (which will read, "T Alva E" for Thomas Alva Edison), she took it for a spin up to her son's house on San Diego Road in the hilly Thousand Oaks district.

"I began to smell something funny," Fine said, "then I saw some smoke and the little red light came on. So I stopped and let the engine cool." Fine never made it to her son's house that day. She just drove the car gently back down the hill to her apartment on Washington and Cornell.

After letting the car recharge all night through a cable her sons had set up in the garage, Fine and her car went for another ride.

The second time it was worse, she said. The engine just stopped. A friendly neighbor helped Fine push the obstinate car to the curb and the patient new mother walked home alone.

That's when the real battle began — the seemingly futile search for an electric car repair shop.

"I had big trouble finding someone to service the car," Fine said, waving her arms. No fewer than six people went out to her house to try to help, some of them more than once.

One of the hopeful helpfuls was electric car aficionado Charles Huntley, of the Eastbay Chapter of the Electric Auto Association.

Huntley, 48, said that the problem with the comuta-car is that it's an older model electric auto that only uses eight batteries and 48 volts of electricity.

That's only half the voltage of the more recent models, he said, and therefore the comuta-car is always going to have trouble climbing hills and carrying the weight of an extra person.

Huntley said he is a strong proponent of the electric car, but feels that the future of the comuta-car is bleak, given the superior performance of the 16-battery, 96-volt vehicles, which also have the marketing advantage of using conventional auto bodies.

Fine's luck finally changed when the company agent who had delivered the car came up from Lompoc (near across the nation, some 1,300 men and women, mostly men, don their grubbies and spend the week- end in the garage.

here they labor for weeks and months on end, poring television sets and families, in earnest antici- of the transformation they are striving to achieve.

he results of the heavy, dirty, loving labor of the ted hobbyists are homemade electric cars.

he creations of the East Bay enthusiasts will be on Saturday, June 12, at the Electric Auto Show in ard.

rom 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the Sears parking lot at the and Shopping Center, the public will be treated to a 10 electric cars which the amateurs have converted conventional gasoline-powered cars to the quieter, vehicles.

he Electric Auto Association members hope their will become the car of the future.

oo on display will be two commercially converted cars from Jet Industries in Texas.

harles Huntley, 48, spokesman for the association's ay Chapter, said the electric auto enthusiasts gen- work on four-or-five-year-old compact cars in which ome had gone bad.

he conversion to electric power usually takes about onths of weekends to complete, Huntley said.

untley, owner of Zorina Candles in Oakland, has ilt two Volkswagen conversions and will soon e third.

For him, the work of converting the engine is just "playing around...a hobby," but he believes that the electric car will be a viable form of transportation in the near future.

An electric car costs about 2 cents a mile to operate, as opposed to 4 cents a mile for the most gasoline-efficient conventional autos. As gasoline prices continue to rise, Huntley said, more and more electric cars will be tooling silently down the city streets.

" Eventually, the world is going to run out of oil," Huntley said. "Gasoline cars will be in the museums."

"Someday we'll be the only ones on the road."

Because the car's batteries must be recharged after every long stop, Huntley envisions future cities with electric outlets on parking meters, at banks and at grocery stores.

He said the cars the amateurs are producing now are better than any others, even the Jet Industries models.

"In our club we're getting better results than anyone at all. We take more time and more interest than the commercial producers do. We put in much more labor."

The converted electric cars can travel about 90 miles between charges, "a good range for short, daily commutes," Huntley said. That range diminishes in proportion to the speed traveled, he said, but most electric cars, with their 8-horsepower engines, can now reach the 55-mile-an-hour freeway speed.

Huntley said the older electric car models such as the comuta-car produced by Commuter Vehicles, Inc., are not intended for freeway use and have a maximum speed of 40 miles per hour.

To convert the gasoline-powered cars, the amateur electrician-mechanics remove the entire engine and replace it with an electric motor purchased for $600 from electronic manufacturing companies.

Each car is powered by 16, 60-pound batteries that together produce a total of 96 volts. Huntley said the batteries must be replaced every 20,000 miles — about once a year — costing the owner about $1,000 each time.

Without figuring the cost of labor, Huntley said each converted electric car is worth about $3,000. However, the least expensive model at Jet Industries sells for $12,000.

The Electric Auto Association was founded in San Jose 16 years ago by Walter Laskie.

Once a year for the past three years the East Bay chapter hold a rally in Oakland in which the amateurs drive their creations continuously around a 2.9-mile course until the batteries are exhausted. The person whose car lasts the longest wins the contest.

This year's rally will be at the Oakland Hyatt in August.

Writer's cramp

Summer daze

By ROBERTA ALEXANDER

When I was too old to go to camp, I had a locker at Brighton Beach Baths. Brighton Private, it was called, to distinguish it from the adjacent strip of Coney Island that was known as Brighton Beach.

I shared the locker with my cousin Sybil, as well as our mothers. Since the adult presence was minimal, so were our housekeeping standards. I was in a constant state of siege with my mother over the state of my room, and Sibbie's reputation as a slob was based on the collection of used tissues she kept on the floor and the fact that she could hang skirts in her jammed closet without using a hanger. I guess our mothers decided there wasn't much to choose from between us.

We had a closet-sized locker on a corridor of the maze-like women's side. We covered the walls with pictures of movie stars and kicked our wet towels under the bench. The locker area had communal shower rooms, a solarium, and an abundance of aging female flesh. It was an uncomfortable intimation of mortality, and I tried not to watch the older women, with their mahogany skin, their crepey necks, their dark-veined legs.

Brighton Private had a cool, dim cafeteria, often empty. But the tables outside the cafeteria were always full because that's where the mah-jongg players congregated. No matter how early I got there or how late I stayed, there were always a dozen or two turban-clad women, slapping tiles on the table.

I spent a good deal of my summer trying to avoid what other people came to the beach for — sun. How I longed for a warm, honeyed, sexy tan and how I envied Sibbie, whose skin turned a dark glowing copper.

If my skin were any fairer, I'd be an albino. It's the kind of milk-white stuff that could have encased an antebellum damsel.

I discovered that I came in only two shades: pale and burnt. And in the process of turning from one into the other, all my freckles had babies. And we are talking big families here.

I tried everything to get a tan. I oiled myself assiduously, kept myself covered with beachcoats or ponchos, limited my exposure to 15 minutes during the coolest part of the day. No matter. Youth crime drops, but officials question figures

Changes in law may hide juvenile offenders

By JON BASHOR

The number of youthful criminals arrested in Contra Costa County is declining, but some officials warn the numbers may be misleading.

Changes in the law, unsolved cases and the increasing ber of youths who stand trial as adults may hide the that juvenile crime is not decreasing, say law enforcet officials.

Nevertheless, the county sheriff's department reportat arrests of juveniles, those younger than age 18, for us crimes in the county dropped from 2,044 in 1978 to 8 in 1979. In 1980, the last year for which statistics are able, the total was 1,959.

The county classifies murder, forcible rape, robbery, lt, burglary, theft and motor vehicle thefts as serious ses.

In 1980, Contra Costa minors were charged with killone person, raping 15, robbing 116 people and asing 188 in 1980. They also were arrested for 1,120 laries and 358 thefts, and charged with stealing 161 r vehicles.

Though the total number of arrests fell last year, bur- arrests increased. Thefts remained about the same homicides, rapes and robberies declined from 1979 to .

The drop has been caused in part by legislation and in by a declining juvenile population and changes in law rcement policies, police officials say.

Some police officers credit better juvenile behavior special prevention programs. Law enforcement offi also say many problems could be reduced with greater ntal cooperation.

About one-fourth of all arrests in the county involve juveniles. But most are crimes against property, not against people.

"Kids mainly do property crimes," said Sgt. Al Snell of the county sheriff's juvenile division. "They are often more interested in excitement than confrontation."

When juveniles do commit serious crimes, Snell said, they are often unintentional. The fire at St. Patrick's School in Rodeo is an example of burglary and vandalism which got out of hand, said Snell.

Arrests for both minor and serious offenses are slowing. Ten years ago, the number of juveniles arrested for all offenses was 12,447. In 1980, there were 8,793 arrests.

The decrease stems partly from 1978 changes in certain categories of juvenile crime. Now, such offenses as running away, truancy and being beyond parental control are considered social problems, not crimes.

A second change allows suspects age 16 and older to be tried in adult courts for violent crimes such as homicide, rape, arson, kidnapping and armed robbery.

Some officers, however, are critical of the recent changes and of juvenile laws in general since they allow juveniles and parents to avoid responsibility.

Sgt. Art Shields of Hercules said juveniles are not as intimidated as adult offenders because minors usually face only short sentences in Juvenile Hall and they know their record will be sealed when they reach age 18.

But, he said, the recent amendments did more than change the law.

"Now kids think they can do whatever they want," said Shields. "They know we can't do anything unless they commit a serious offense."

Shields said juvenile crime is not serious in Hercules, but occasionally gang activities spill over into the community from San Francisco and San Leandro. Hercules is most affected by Filippino youths involved in gang activities, he said.

In Pinole, Sgt. Ed Martin said the well-publicized gang activities of 1980 have not resurfaced. But Martin said the "vast majority" of Pinole burglaries are committed by juveniles.

An average of one burglary a day is reported to Pinole police, Martin said. About 60 percent of all crime is committed by juveniles, he estimated. Alcohol offenses and vandalism are other common juvenile offenses.

"Juvenile crime isn't necessarily rising," said Martin, "but it isn't going down either."

Accurate statistics for juvenile crime are difficult to find because not all incidents are reported, and not all of the reported cases are solved.

Cecil Landrum, assistant director of county juvenile probation, said only 10 percent of all burglaries are solved with an arrest. But, he pointed out, young criminals are usually less sophisticated than their adult counterparts and are more likely to be caught.

Though exact figures are not available, Charles Stevenson, probation officer and member of the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Commission, said juvenile crime is higher in the West County than in other areas of Contra Costa, primarily due to higher crime rates in Richmond and San Pablo.

San Pablo Police Chief David Sylstra estimated up to 60 percent of the criminal activity in his jurisdiction is committed by people age 25 and younger. Of the 60 percent, perhaps half are committed by juveniles.

Sylstra attributed San Pablo's problems partly to social factors. Large numbers of San Pablo families are headed by single parents, he said, and a lack of parental supervision contributes to juvenile problems.

Sgt. Shields of Hercules said the law should be changed to make parents take on even more responsibilty. This would reduce the problem of juvenile crime, he predicts.

"We're not here to put the kid in Juvenile Hall," he said. "We want help from the parents to help straighten the kid out before more serious trouble happens."

Shields said he has encountered parents and guardians who don't care what happens to their children and aren't interested in knowing their whereabouts.

Also, parents sometimes refuse to believe their child has committed a crime.

"Parents don't accept the fault of their child," Shields said. "They say he's not that type of kid.

"Until parents are made more responsible you can forget about putting a lid on juvenile crime."

Sgt. Snell of the sheriff's office agreed. Current programs for juveniles include counseling, probation and stay-in-school projects, all requiring parental involvement.

Down in Santa Cruz they clone redwoods

Replenishing the vanishing coastal giants

Sixty million years ago, coastal redwoods were common throughout the Northern Hemisphere. Today, they are confined to a 500-mile stretch along the Pacific coast, from Monterey to the southwestern tip of Oregon.

Although changes in climate are largely responsible for the redwood's diminished range, intensive logging for the past century has contributed to its steady disappearance. Of the remaining two million acres, only 60,000 are virgin timber. And conservationists say nearly half-a-million acres could sustain new or additional redwood growth.

For the past 30 years, biology professor Ernest Ball of UC-Santa Cruz has been working on ways that may well revolutionize reforestation and the timber industry. Ball is cloning redwoods, or producing genetically identical "plantlets" from a single piece of redwood tissue.

"Cloning is not as startling a concept in the plant world as it is in the animal world," says Ball. Propagating African violets or geraniums by rooting their leaves in potting soil is one type of cloning. Cloning trees is more difficult, but not all that uncommon.

Ball was more interested in the redwood's academic value than its commercial value when he began working to clone redwood tissue in the 1950s. While at the University of North Carolina, the plant scientist was the first to culture a gymnosperm, the class of trees to which the redwood belongs.

"No one had attacked the big conifers," he says. "The work grew to be extremely interesting, and being an eager young grad student, like everyone else, I was always looking for something interesting."

But the tissue culture techniques that Ball and his associate, Patricia Ponzini, use today are more than just academically interesting; they offer many advantages for propagating redwoods. For example, the two scientists can select and reproduce what they think are genetically superior trees, thereby eliminating the chance of a cross with inferior stock.

They have discovered that tissue from redwoods growing at higher altitudes in drier soil produces healthier plantlets than tissue from redwoods growing at lower altitudes. Ball suspects that the high-altitude trees represent superior stocks that never get the chance to assert themselves because of poor environmental conditions.

The tissue culture technique is useful because one snip of tissue can produce up to 30 buds, each forming a plantlet, and eventually, a tree.

This high-yield potential is particularly important for the redwoods in the Santa Cruz area, where, Ball says, cones usually produce only a few viable seeds. In wetter southern Oregon, however, redwoods seem to produce cones with nearly all viable seeds.

Another phenomenon Ball has noticed in the Santa Cruz area is cones with fully developed but dead seeds. He offers two explanations: either a lethal virus that has yet to be discovered killed the seeds, or a bad genetic makeup rendered them sterile.

The latter is more probable, Ball says, because of the redwoods' great genetic variability. They have 66 chromosomes, almost three times as many as most other conifers. This means that redwoods can possibly have nine billion variations.

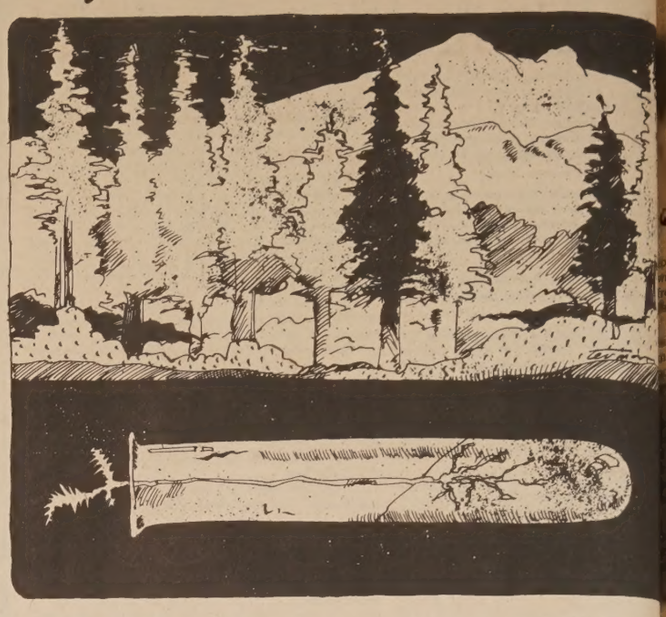
Ball's tissue culture technique has three main steps: maintaining a piece of tissue in culture; including the cells to dedifferentiate; and then, inducing them to respecialize.

One batch of cloned plantlets has been successfully cultivated in a test plot for the last five years by the Simpson Timber Co., a supporter of Ball's research. So far, the tissue culture plantlets are growing twice as fast as conventionally produced seedlings.

But only time will tell the value of tissue culture techniques. If all goes well, the redwoods from Ball's laboratory, if they are to be logged, will be ready for harvesting in another hundred years. Or, if preserved, they will have just begun their 800- or even 2000- year existence.

The coastal redwood, or Sequoia sempervirens, is prized for its beauty and its lumber. Unlike its larger relative in the high Sierras, the Sequoia giganteas, the coastal redwood resists insects, decay and fire, and its wood products are straight-grained, shrinkproof and durable.

A great testimony to its fire resistance came in 1906 after the San Francisco earthquake and fire left many redwood structures virtually untouched.



Because the redwood's trunk tapers only [illegible] reaches its full height of 350 feet, its lumber [illegible] One acre of average redwoods yields about 70 [illegible] feet of lumber, enough to build five small [illegible] comparison, prime stands of fir and pine in the [illegible] South yield about 7,500 board feet of lumber [illegible] trees.

The circus: still dazzling Americana

Trying to survive television, hard times

By LINDA ST. THOMAS
Smithsonian News Service

"I'm running away to join the circus" is a threat few parents will be hearing these days. The era of big top circuses, in their heyday in the 1920s, seems to be winding down. Last year, only three canvas big tops with seating capacities of 3,000 or more made their way from town to town: Carson & Barnes, Clyde Beatty-Cole Bros. Circus and Circus Vargas.

It's hard to make ends meet when the annual gasoline bill is $735,000, when the big top rips and a new one costs more that $80,000 and daily grocery purchases include 600 pounds of sweet feed, two tons of hay, 150 pounds of raw meat and 400 pounds of oats.

"Circus day was rural America's principal holiday for years," says Richard Flint, a Smithsonian Institution specialist on American popular entertainment and president of the Circus Historical Society. "In the past few decades, however, the circus has taken a back seat to TV, movies and sports events. But that's not to say that people don't still enjoy a good circus."

Despite the financial problems, the circus still attracts big crowds. An estimated 12 million people went to the surviving circuses last year. (There are, however, no estimates on how many youngsters ran away to join one.)

For the past three years, Flint has brought popular big top and sideshow acts to the Smithsonian's National Museum of American History in Washington, D.C., giving visitors a chance to celebrate spring the way Americans have for the past 190 years — by going to the circus.

The circuses that survived television have had to adjust both to today's economy and to the tastes of sophisticated modern audiences. They have eliminated elaborate pre-circus morning parades, extended their seasons into early December and have even patched up their canvases to hold together for just one more year. America's largest circus, in fact, no longer even uses the traditional circus big top.

This season, circus-owner Cliff Vargas has announced several cost-cutting moves, including the elimination of seven trucks from his fleet as well as about 3,000 miles from the 1982 routes.

At the Clyde Beatty-Cole Bros. Circus, 44-year-old owner John W. Pugh, is able to compare today's circus operation with those of the good old days when he did a little of everything himself — "working the elephants, walking wires, jumping on trampolines and doing electrical work."

He says the job of putting up and tearing down a circus at every stop is a logistical nightmare, yet a task that's a lot faster and easier these days than in the 1950s when he first traveled with an American circus.

Three times a week during the season, in shopping malls from Massachusetts to Florida, the Beatty-Cole canvas boss and his men are at work at daybreak. The crew drives metal spikes into the pavement, following markings made the night before by the advance man. Four 55-foot-high center poles and 120 smaller poles are raised.

And, finally, the 300-by-150 foot, blue-and-white striped big top is unrolled from its giant spool with the help of two elephants (they are more efficient than forklifts). That's better than the old days, when, Pugh says, the 8,000-pound canvas was folded into 10 sections, then unfolded at every stop, a task that took at least two hours.

Other modernizations in the big top itself include the use of synthetic rope and lightweight aluminum sectional poles instead of the old wooden telephone poles. At Carson & Barnes, even the traditional canvas tent has been retired and replaced by a plastic big top that lasts up to eight seasons.

The very location of many tent circuses — in shopping mall parking lots — tells something about how they have adapted in order to attract the crowd. Time-honored circus traditions — muddy grounds and dust storms kicked up by prancing elephants — are gone now, replaced by the ubiquitous striped blacktop of parking lots.

The mall sites offer advantages, according to marketing specialist Dave Hunter at Beatty-Cole. There is a built-in audience accustomed to coming to the mall and enough level space to set up the 4,500-capacity tent, the sideshow and about 28 trucks. The mall owners and merchants are often happy to promote the show because circus-goers bring more business to their shops.

America's biggest circus, Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey, adapted to the changing times 26 years ago when it abandoned all outdoor big top performances because they had become prohibitively expensive.

"By the late '40s, the Ringling show was so cumbersome that it took 108 railroad cars to transport it from town to town," Flint says. "The big top was the length of

1000 Oaks church sets children's play groups

THOUSAND OAKS — Epworth United Methodist Church has established a regular program of children's play groups open to the public, for ages 12 months to 31/2 years.

There are currently groups each meeting every week for two-hour sessions. Groups range from structured activities to strictly play time. One group is for families where one member is hearing impaired.

The goal of these groups are to provide an opportunity for children to interact with other children on a regular basis and to provide a support structure for mothers, particularly first-time mothers.

Hidie Sanders, play group coordinator at the church, said "these groups fill needs that, as far as we know, no other organization is currently doing for this age group in the area."

The church recently sponsored a first-aid class focusing on first aid for children in the home. "We will continue to look for other educational needs for the parents to supplement the regular playgroup sessions," she said.

For more information, call 527-4013.

The church is located in the Thousand Oaks district of North Berkeley at 1953 Hopkins St.

Pot luck

Would anyone like meatloaf?

Whenever most folk think of meatloaf, it is in terms of low-budget, end-of-the-month meals. True, meat loaves are fairly inexpensive, but they don't deserve the last-resort status they sometimes get.

Not only can a small amount of meat be extended, but with the clever use of different extenders and tasty seasonings, a meatloaf can become a company dinner. It also is a great way to get protein without having to chew hard. It's an easily digested entree for children and convalescents as well as for those with teeth problems.

The basic idea is to combine ground meat with an extender that makes more from less and keeps it tender and moist. Then add seasonings and a binder to keep it from falling apart. Traditional meatloaves combine some ground veal or pork or both with beef, but very nice results can be had with only beef or veal. I always try to add a bit of pork because I like the flavor.

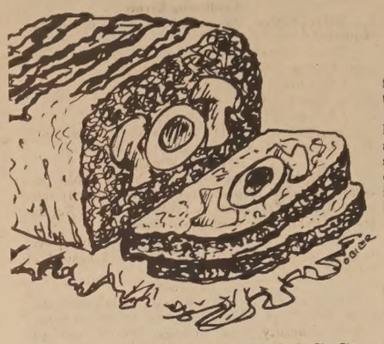
Back to basic techniques

Exact recipes are not really needed if the cook understands what is happening in the cooking. You know how I feel about "cooking by numbers." Except for baking (which is actually a controlled chemical reaction), you, as the chef, can make the changes which suit you. So when someone asks for a "good meatloaf" recipe, I can only give general suggestions. You put them together.

As an extender, soft bread soaked in milk is standard. But many cooks swear by cracker crumbs, rye bread, or stuffing mix. Others, more nutritionally minded, use oatmeal (raw or cooked) or cooked rice or a handful of wheat germ. Each has its own distinct texture and flavor.

Infinite variations

For seasonings, a minced onion is traditional. Some insist it be sauteed in butter first. I like it that way. But you could add grated carrots or celery, chopped mushrooms or green peppers, and even minced pine nuts. Try some chopped fresh tomatoes and shredded zucchini sometime.



— Illustration by Olga Bier

To flavor it, salt and pepper is the usual. But have you tried a dash of cinnamon or a grating of lemon peel? I like to add about 1 T. of prepared mustard and a good shake of catsup too. An Indian flavored meat loaf could have 1 T. of chutney, a generous dash of curry powder and some sliced almonds. Don't forget minced garlic or a dollop of horseradish or some Parmesan cheese.

The binder is, of course, several beaten eggs. But extra flavor can be had by adding 1/2 c. of red wine or tomato sauce or some soy sauce.

You see, the choices are infinite. Just decide on your favorite ingredients. Then bake it in a loaf pan, mold it in a round shape on a flat pan, pat it into a ring mold (and fill the center with vegetables when you serve it), make individual loaves in a muffin tin, or pat it flat in a pie plate. Top it with bacon, grated cheese, cranberry sauce or a paste of mustard and brown sugar. Create your own culinary masterpiece.

Surprise!

Cutting open a meat loaf and finding an unex filling or center makes it very special. Try this time.

Assemble your favorite meat loaf, pat half of i loaf pan. Lay in a layer of chopped mushrooms, and celery that have been sauteed in butter, season salt and pepper, and blended with 1 c. of soft crumbs. Top with the rest of the meat loaf mixture a into shape. When this loaf is sliced, it makes a layered entree.

Here's looking at you,

I like to put peeled hard-boiled eggs in the ce my meat loaf, flanked by large whole mushroom effect is a big yellow eye of a Cyclops.

You can do this by patting half of your meat lo the pan. Then place a row of peeled hard-cooked eg to end lengthwise. Stand up some clean large mush in a row along either side of the eggs and gently p remaining mixture over and around them. Bake a and allow to cool slightly. A tasty surprise in the appears when sliced.

And yet, for those who want to try a more stra recipe, here's an old goodie with lots of zip.

Ground Beef Pie for

Combine:
1 1/2 lbs. ground beef
4 slices bread soaked in
1/2 c. milk
Add:
1/2 c. chopped parsley
1 beaten egg
1 t. salt
2 t. soy sauce
Pat into a 10 inch cake or pie plate. Cover with 1/2 lemon sliced thin
1 green pepper, sliced thin crosswise in rings
1 large onion cut crosswise in thin rings
Mix:
3/4 c. catsup
1/4 c. water
Pour over all, dot with butter and bake in a (450 degrees) 30 minutes or until done. Serve in

And here's a different one my old friend Ray serve, spiked with horseradish.

Ray's Spinach Loaf

Mix together:
1 lb. ground beef
2 pkgs. frozen chopped spinach, thawed and well
1 onion, finely minced
1 c. cooked rice
2 t. salt
Dash pepper
2 slightly beaten eggs

Pack into a 5 x 9 inch loaf pan. Lay slices of top and bake 1 hour at 350 degrees. Serve with ish. A bit different but very good.

Are you inspired now to create a new meatl

Why the police chief should be appointed

By ANNE ROTRAMEL
Vice Mayor

ALBANY — Now that the election is over, and in the belief that Chief James Simmons does not intend to serve an additional term of office, I would like to share my views concerning the absurdity of our City Charter provision mandating the election of our chief of police.

I admit that, on the surface, the notion of electing the chief has a certain appeal. There is a feeling that in this way the Police Department is answerable to you, the public. Please permit me to demonstrate what I believe to be the fallacies inherent in this notion.

First, consider the limitations imposed by the requirement that the chief be a resident. Obviously, to be effective, the chief must have substantial experience both in the field and in the classroom. There are very few people in the Bay Area who would make suitable candidates. There are even fewer suitable candidates in the City of Albany. Remember, one need not be a resident to serve in our department and only a very small fraction of our force resides here. I submit that we deserve the very best chief that we can afford to hire and I further suggest that we should have the opportunity to recruit at least beyond our narrow borders.

Second, it is rare that anyone opposes an incumbent chief. Note also that it has not been Albany's experience for the incumbent chief to retire at the end of a term. Most often the chief leaves the job mid-term which means that the City Council selects a successor from the force who then becomes the unopposed incumbent. Try to imagine what an intra-departmental political race would be like and I am sure you will understand why, historically, the chief runs unopposed. Obviously then, in this instance, the democratic system breaks down. Elections with one candidate are not elections at all, in the usual sense of the word.

Budget time, like election time, brings the issue of the elected chief into focus. In this community, the Police Department is largely autonomous. The City Council does not oversee the day-to-day operations of the department, nor does it have much policy-making authority. How, then, can the City Council intelligently allocate funds, especially now that every department will be forced to make necessary cuts due to ever dwindling revenues?

The City Council, the Police Department, and you, the public, are caught in this untenable position. Now that we can examine the problem, without it becoming a battle of personalities, I hope we can begin a dialogue on the issues. I suspect it is not an accident that we are one of only two cities in all of California to be trapped in this situation.

Let's work together to build a system that comports with good city management. The first step is to begin a debate on the subject in the hope that we will educate ourselves in the process.

UC researchers cite aci rain threat in the Sierra

By DONNA ALVARADO

Researchers at UC's Lawrence Berkeley Laboratory have found that lakes in the Sierra Nevada, source of irrigation water for California agriculture, is particularly vulnerable to ecological damage from acid rain pollution.

But the East Bay's Briones Reservoir, standby source of drinking water for Berkeley and Oakland, contains a natural soil buffer protecting it from the effects of acid rain.

In a unique laboratory designed to simulate the effects of acid rain on lake water, UC-Berkeley graduate student Kathy Tonnessen studied the effects of increasing the acidity of water taken from Briones and two Sierra lakes.

She found that the Sierra lakes were unable to compensate for increased acidity and showed increased concentrations of toxic metals such as aluminum.

Ms. Tonnessen is a UC-Berkeley graduate student working with LBL researcher John Harte, who is investigating the effects of acid rain in the western United States.

She found that lakes respond differently to acid according to their particular chemistry. Briones water, containing soil sediment high in alkaline limestone, can absorb the acidity of polluted rain. The Sierra lake water, coming from mountain bedrock high in granite and low in limestone, was unable to compensate for the increased acidity.

The laboratory "allows us to look into the future and predict what happens to lakes that are polluted," said Harte.

Although the researchers did not measure the acidity of rain falling on the reservoirs and lakes in California, they did study what would happen if acid rain were falling.

Ms. Tonnessen said previous research has shown that large increases in acidity of lake water can mobilize potentially toxic metals found in the lake sediment.

In her laboratory experiment, she increased the acidity in samples of lake water and found soaring concentrations of aluminum, iron and magnesium in those samples low in alkaline sediment.

In all, Harte and Ms. Tonnessen have found that 25 lakes in the Sierra Nevada are perilously low in limestone and alkaline soils that act as natural buffers to absorb acidity coming from polluted rain.

Harte said that even those lakes buffered by an alkaline soil have a a limit to the amount of acidity they can absorb. Once that limit is reached, the alkalinity is depleted and the lake will absorb acidity from the rain.

Aluminum has been shown to kill fish by clogging their gil slits and causing suffocation. It has also been shown to damage roots of trees in Germany. Ms. Tonnessen said the effects of high amounts of aluminum on agriculture are just beginning to be studied.

User fees up sharply in wake of Prop. 13

By DONNA ALVARADO

Californians may be getting relief from the headache of high property taxes since Proposition 13 passed in 1978, but a University of California study shows that local governments are making up for lost tax revenues by increasing their charges for selected services.

For some local communities that may mean a bigger fee in building permit fees, charges for a copy of birth certificates and even using the local swimming pool.

In their study, UC-Santa Barbara economists Lloyd Mercer and W. Douglas Morgan suggest that charging for certain services may be one way of promoting efficiency in local government — and equity in who pays for it.

Their report was published by UC-Berkeley's Institute for Governmental Studies.

Although the user charges are not new, the study shows that they jumped higher in fiscal year 1979 in response to the impact of Proposition 13. In a recent interview, Mercer suggested that an even bigger increase may be coming in fiscal year 1982.

"What we are talking about are charges for things done by government for specific people," said Mercer.

"From an economic point of view, those people should pay for it rather than the general taxpayer."

The report examined charges levied since 1957 by city and county governments for such services as land planning, sewage and garbage collection, health inspection, vital statistics, libraries, parks and recreation. Although they increased annually 10 percent on the average between 1970 and 1978, they jumped an average of 12.8 percent from 1978 to 1979.

The report identified an increase in 12 of 21 common user charges levied by California's cities and counties. The biggest jump came in planning services such as zoning and planning fees charged to building developers. The percent rate of change in these two fees soared by 45.3 percent and 45.5 percent in fiscal year 1979. Other significant rates of increase came in special fire service fees (35.3 percent), animal shelter fees (30.4 percent) and garbage collection (24 percent).

Because charges did not keep pace with the soaring costs of city and county services during the 1970s, Mercer said, local communities were heavily subsidized from the state's general revenue fund. When this fund shrank after Proposition 13, cities and counties started quickly turned to charging more for their services.

Mercer expects an even bigger increase in fees proposed for fiscal 1982. For the last few years, the state's surplus fund has continued to flow to local communities to lessen the effect of lost revenues.

The bail-out is gone, however, for 1982. The state expects to run up a $2 billion deficit instead.

In Berkeley, the defeat this spring of Measure A — which would have increased local taxes — meant that it was no avoiding the year of financial reckoning coming ahead.

As a result, Berkeley has joined the rush to increase fees for some services such as building permits, restaurant health inspections, the animal neutering program and city swimming pools.

"Since Proposition 13 we've been trying to bring in dollars," said Phil Kamlarz, assistant to the city manager. "The crunch is greater this year."

Kamlarz said the City Council has adopted a policy statement that certain people cannot afford to pay for the services and they will continue to be subsidized.

The city's libraries are required to be free by city charter and health care will continue to be free or low-cost to those who qualify, he said.

But fees for other services will probably rise, he said, and they will be enforced more strictly.

"It's not going to solve all our problems, but it's a small step," he said.

Elephant power

Powerful pachyderms help the 15-man canvas crew of the Beatty-Cole Circus raise the big top in Morgantown, West Virginia. Modern circuses could use forklifts to do the same work, but circus owners know elephants do a better job, especially in muddy fields.

Step right up, it's the greatest show on earth

one-and-a-half football fields; you couldn't even see from one end of the tent to the other. Figuratively, it just collapsed under its own weight."

"The greatest show on earth," as P.T. Barnum first called it in the 1870s, gave its last under-canvas performance July 16, 1956, in Pittsburgh. Today, Ringling's two shows, called the "red unit" and the "blue unit," use indoor arenas or civic centers. They offer several obvious advantages: no weather problems, permanent beams for aerial act riggings, air conditioning and even more important to the owners, more seats to fill.

In New York City's Madison Square Garden, home of the Ringling Circus for three months every spring, more than 17,000 people may watch each performance. All in all, the "red" and "blue" units attract 8 million people a year in 80 cities.

Accommodating the Ringling circus was one objective urban planners have had in mind when they designed modern stadiums during the past 20 years. "Our requirements are fairly simple," Frank Roach, Ringling's assistant director of routing and tours, says. "A ceiling height of 45 feet, the floor dimensions of a hockey rink and foot inserts to support high wire riggings are all we need."

The indoor sites share one disadvantage: They're just not like the old-fashioned American circus, Dorey Miller of Carson & Barnes show, says.

"The traveling circus has lots of hustle and bustle, it's a 24-hour-a-day- operation," Miller adds. "People still come to watch us set up every morning and sometimes I think that's as interesting, especially for the kids, as the show itself." Miller, a veteran of 46 years under the big top, takes his circus to a new town every single night from mid-March until late November, hitting some 250 towns per season.

Publicizing the circus, whether it's a big top or an indoor show, is always big business. Advertising handbills and posters have been around as long as the circus. Their message is always the same, "Come to our circus. . .it's the best."

Floyd King, circus owner and publicity agent for more that 60 years, described his own show, the King Brothers Circus, in typical breathless circus style:

"...the greatest exhibition of mammoth entertainment of any state or country. . .ever proclaimed the year's best holiday with all its wealth and new and mighty wonders gathered from every part of the world. . .a continuous, every varying, always changing kaleidoscopic multiplicity of all-star acts by all stellar artists, embracing a flood of foreign talent never before seen in America."

Circus patrons may not see these same words on posters or advertisements today, but if they listen closely to the big top announcers, they are sure to hear such phrases as "death-defying acts of dare-devilry," "amazing aerial artistry" and "an awesome assemblage of ferocious felines."

Once inside the big top, however, most people are not concerned with publicity or the logistical problems of moving a circus. They are there to enjoy performances that essentially never change from year to year: the acrobats, the flying trapeze artists, wild animal shows, trained bears, jugglers and, of course, the clowns.

Albany's new babysitting co-op

ALBANY — The Albany Babysitting Co-op is having a potluck picnic on Saturday, June 19 from 11:30 to 1:30 at the home of Teresa and Art Martinez, 950 Masonic.

New or prospective members are invited to come and meet the families in the co-op; bring the children and a lunch to share.

The co-op was formed in February by 12 families in northern Albany, all with small children.

According to Helen Winters, the group's chairperson, "As the mother of a small child, I couldn't do much around the house anyway. It seemed to me that I should be watching another child at the same time and freeing up a mother. The co-op saved my life. And the bonus is that the children have new playmates."

Winters adds that the co-op has become her major parent support system: "Since I see these families once a week or so, we discuss our children's problems or accomplishments; we share ideas about appropriate toys, games, cloths, schools, doctors, and all the tricks of the trade. We commiserate and we help each other."

The co-op works by the use of tickets. Each family gets 20 hours worth of tickets when they join (for a $2 initiation fee). Members can use the co-op as often or as seldom as they wish.

Some people use 10 or 12 tickets weekly and do a commensurate amount of sitting. Others use the co-op to go out once a month.

For details and reservations (and in case of rain), call Winters at 527-2314.

Cornell students correspond with author/actor Alan Ar

ALBANY — Ten students from Albany's Cornell elementary school recently received a personal letter from actor-writer Alan Arkin.

He was responding to individual letters they had written him after completing his novel, The Lemming Condition, for their reading group.

The students are in Robert Alpert's fourth grade class and their reading group is taught by instructional aide Carla Harkness.

The Lemming Condition was recommended to the class by Helen Grossman, Cornell's reading specialist.

Lemmings are small rodents about five inches long, native to the mountains of Scandinavia and the Arctic region. They reproduce quickly, and after several generations become severely overcrowded. When this occurs, they instinctively march to the sea and drown themselves. The few babies left behind carry on the species.

Arkin's novel is about a small lemming named Bubber who questions the wisdom of the species' march to death and refuses to follow the crowd.

"We worked on a character at a time," said Harkness. The vocabulary was difficult and the content often complex, but the kids persevered and completed each assignment. As a final project we wrote Alan Arkin a short letter expressing our feelings about his book."

In their notes, each student expressed appreciation for the story, described a favorite character and asked about Bubber's future. They also asked Arkin why he wrote the book and where he got his ideas for his stories.

A few weeks later, they received a two page letter. "I was very moved by the letters. Their questions are more astute than those of many adults I've spoken with. I am honored to be included with such stories as "Rikki Tikki Tavi," one of my all time favorites...it does my old ego good to have become the author of a 'textbook,'" Arkin wrote.

The students — Kwang Chong, Jacob Clark, Tracey Van, Ryan Lewis, Joseph Jones, Tracy McPeak, Lisa Van Zantwuck, Roland Revoir, Russell Kobayashi, Audrey Hill, ad C.J. Donaghue — were both delighted and surprised to receive a letter from Arkin.

"When I wrote the story, I checked a lot of sources," Arkin explained, "and no one was actually sure whether or not (lemmings) really jumped, so I wrote it as kind of a fairy tale...Then after the book came out, my youngest son, Tony, took me to his fifth grade library and showed me a movie where you see them doing what I described. It's a strange and disturbing thing to watch and it reminds me of a lot of things that people do."

Arkin also mentioned that he is now sequel to The Lemming Condition. It tells adventures after all his friends and relatives their deaths.

"For a long while the only thing he himself is that he is not a lemming and that Arkin wrote. "He has to know that he is. A are like that, aren't they?"

Class set on working

A free summer course at North Berkeley Senior Center offers an exploration of the meaning of work.

"Work and Life" evaluates past work experiences and discovers new work, involvement, responsibility and meaningful activity after retirement. "Work and Life," a text on loan to participants, is an anthology of literature, biography, art and song published by the National Council on the Aging, Inc.

The discussion group will be led by Helen Marie Brown, who has worked as a librarian, word processor, writer and teacher.

The group will meet on Fridays, from June 18 through Aug. 20, 1-3 p.m., at 1901 Heart St., Berkeley.

All are welcome. Call 644-6107 for additional information.

LET'S TALK IT OVER with Odd E. Haugen

How about buying an old house and fixing it up . . . to live in, to resell or for rental income? There are more old homes than new ones. Some are in established, attractive neighborhoods, spacious and of top-quality construction. Some people have made a fair living by buying, refurbishing or remodeling and reselling older homes.

As a hobby, some hazards are involved. It's easy to overlook structural flaws or underestimate the costs of remodeling and renovation. The electrical system may not be adequate for today's appliances. The neighborhood may be in a downtrend. If you don't have first-hand experience, be sure to have the best advice . . . ours!

We'd like to help you find exactly what you want in real estate . . . to live in or to fix up for resale. Why not "Talk It Over" with us?

AHS honors 5 seniors

ALBANY — The Albany High School Site Council has selected the following graduating seniors for special student recognition: Paul Fisher, Pam Howe, Lisa Kunkel, Steve Lopez and Jamie Shepherd.

The council selected the students on the basis of independent thinking and an acceptance of adult responsibility, as well as a grade point average of 2.0.

Other criteria upon which the council based its decisions were: little or no previous publicity; personal and academic growth and achievement; leadership ability; adherence to school/classroom rules; atendance; respect for self and others; good citizenship; good sportsmanship and creativity.

Paul Fisher is extensively involved in community and school service. He works 20 hours a week at McDonald's, plays the piano and is an amateur photographer.

During his high school career, Fisher has been chairperson of the school Site Council; has attended the Youth Environmental Council; has coordinated the Cultural Awareness Days; has been involved in the Year of the High School and has received the State PTA Scholarship.

Pam Howe works in the high school's main office. She has played the violin for several years.

Howe plans to attend Armstrong Business College to pursue a career in business management.

Lisa Kunkel is interested in fashion modeling or going to college. She recently completed a modeling assignment for San Francisco's Nuvo magazine, despite the fact that she attends five classes at Contra Costa Community College and two at Albany High School.

Kunkel has trveled widely in Scandinavia and South America and attended school in Norway for a year.

Steve Lopez has been involved both in sports (he has competed in track events since his freshman year) and academics. He has been a member of MESA (Mathematics-English-Science Achievement) since his sophomore year and helped organize "Martin Luther King Week."

Lopez works three days a week at McDonald's.

Jamie Shepherd's abilities as a calligrapher and as a singer have been her most abiding interests. She has served as vice-president of the school choir and recently spent a weekend at muic camp.

What began as a hobby for Shepherd developed into a substantial interest and she is, at present, the only student in the advanced calligraphy class. Shepherd works at Mary and Joe's Sporting Goods, where she engraves plaques and trophies.

By Oswald Jacoby and Alan Sontag

Today's hand left all four players unhappy with their respective partners. North and South blamed each other for reaching the silly no-trump game when five clubs was the cinch to end all cinches.

Their arguments were mild, but East and West really went to it. It seems that West had opened the king of hearts and East signaled with the 10 spot. West continued quickly with the ace and jack. At this stage of the proceedings East broke the tempo by thinking. Then he studied, cogitated, gazed at the ceiling and finally played his queen on his partner's jack. Now the nine blocked the suit and South made his three no-trump.

West suggested sarcastically that East should just toss a coin when he had a problem and would then have an even money chance of being right.

East wanted to know if West was so smart why he hadn't defended correctly by playing his jack of hearts at trick two? In that case it would have been easy for East to duck and then get in his fifth heart.

East was correct. That lead of the jack of hearts at trick two would have kept East from going wrong. It also would have been the sort of play that not even the greatest of players would think of and make at the table.

Astro-graph/Bernice Bede Osol

If your birthday is Wednesday, June 9:

People with whom you associate this coming year will help expand your horizons and give you new slants on life. Two, in particular, will be especially influential.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20)
Strive to be cooperative today in your social involvements. If you are too set on having your own way it could spoil everyone's fun, including your own.

CANCER (June 21-July 22)
If you have performed your work or tasks to the best of your ability today, don't berate yourself later for not having done more. Be satisfied with your accomplishments.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22)
You'll want to be active and around friends today, but take care in selecting your companions. Don't include a gripe mixer.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22)
Your possibilities for personal gain are good today. However, if you feel entitled to more, you could end up being discontented with the results.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 23)
Follow through on the way you envision things and all should go smoothly today. Don't alter your plans merely because another questions your methods.

SCORPIO (Oct. 24-Nov. 22)
Be fair in your business practices and financial dealings today, but don't give more than you should just because someone whines about the arrangements.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 23-Dec. 21)
Try to avoid persons today who are wishy-washy and indecisive. You'll be happier with pals who know what they want to do and who aren't afraid to go after it.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19)
You're good at making snap decisions today, so don't be hesitant to respond to your flashes of insight. You'll lose momentum if you overanalyze.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 19)
You can learn a great deal today if you mingle with persons who talk about interesting subjects rather than just about themselves. Avoid "I" oriented types.

PISCES (Feb. 20-March 20)
This can be a day of major achievements if you start early to set the wheels in motion. Be a doer today, not just an idea person.

ARIES (March 21-April 19)
Be careful about making commitments today. There is a chance you may impulsively agree to something, than later renege after you've thought it over.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20)
You're very good today in helping others sort things out so that they profit or gain in some manner. However, you may not do well for yourself in the process.
